Superintendent's Report

With winter upon us, I will take this time to explain processes which occur in the grass plant as it prepares itself for and during the winter.

As cooler temperatures arrive in September and October, grass plants begin to harden off. This is the process that occurs in the plant as it prepares itself for winter. Plants will begin to store foods for the long period of time when it will be in a dormant state and cannot produce food. Most of the stored food is in the form of carbohydrates. It is a similar process in animals that hibernate. To encourage hardening off, we apply a winter fertilizer which is low in nitrogen and high in potassium. This increases the thickness of the cell walls and helps lower the freezing point of the cell.

If the winters remain cold and the grass covered in snow, chances are the grass would come through the winter in good shape. However, as we get warm spells throughout the winter, the grass plants dehardens. Dehardening is a plant's loss of ability to resist winter injury. As the plants dehardens, they use up stored carbohydrates thus making the plant more susceptible to winter injury.

As the snow melts and water sits around the grass plant, crown hydration occurs. Crown hydration is not a mechanism of injury, but is rather a condition that occurs within the plant that makes it more susceptible to freezing injury. As the environment around the plants become water soaked, the plant takes on additional water. This lowers the concentration of solutes in the cells and raises the freezing point (closer to 0 degrees C).

Freezing of water inside and outside the cells can cause rupturing of the cell walls and rapid mortality. Within the cell, freezing is resisted because of the stored carbohydrates and other solutes that lower the freezing point of the solution. This resistance to freezing is what allows the plant to survive temperatures below freezing. The crucial part of the plant that needs to resist freezing is the crown area because this is where all new plant growth is initiated.

The new greens on our golf course are built with adequate surface drainage to prevent these conditions. However, the old greens do not have adequate surface drainage resulting in an increased amount of damage coming out of the winter.

Course Superintendent

Construction Report

November has been a busy month at the Prince George Golf & Curling Club, with the clubhouse getting a face life inside and out. Construction on the kitchen is coming along nicely and you may also have noticed renovations to the boardroom converting it into two new offices. This project was left in the capable hands of our maintenance man Lawrence Doherty who did a wonderful job.

Neil and Flo vacated their old office, heading to the bright roomy confines of their new ones. We will also be renovating that office and it will become the new boardroom. On behalf of the ice and maintenance staff, I'd like to wish everyone a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year.

Murray Kutyn

Special Projects

The kitchen expansion project is progressing well despite some inclement weather. Completion is expected by year end, however operations from the new kitchen will not start until mid-January due to the busy Christmas season.

Our kitchen staff is excited about working in the new facility.
